MAKE THE MOST OF FOOD AVAILABLE

By Regina Anderson, Las Vegas Sun

On Super Bowl Sunday, when all eyes were on Allegiant Stadium, my nonprofit organization, Food Recovery Network, began recovering thousands of pounds of surplus food from a large-scale event called the Players Tailgate.

We safely packaged up boxes of unused crab legs, tuna, fresh produce and dairy, and brought it to the Just One Project, which also works to end hunger. Our goal is to disrupt the common practice of throwing away food that's no longer wanted, regardless of whether it's still good, and instead to recover it and provide it to the more than 409,000 people in Nevada who are hungry.

Celebrity Chefs Leverage Fame to Feed the Hungry

Bobby Flay, Aaron May, Marc Murphy, and Michael Symon partner with the Food Recovery Network so low-income Americans can also eat healthy food.

While the relationship between income and diet is a fraught topic, the bottom line is that millions of Americans are not eating nutritious food. And when food is the crux of your problem, you just might need a chef to help fix things.

Enter Bobby Flay, Aaron May, Marc Murphy, and Michael Symon. These celebrity chefs recently participated in the Bullseye Event Group Players Tailgate at Super Bowl LVIII. There, they partnered with the Food Recovery Network to salvage what was left after the feast, and distribute the gourmet food to needy Nevadans.

Flay sees progress in raising awareness. "I think that's changing somewhat. I think that chefs have really been on the forefront of that," he says, touting the Food Network's ability to educate the public.

Cooking for the Rich, Giving to the Poor

Marc Murphy worked his way up through New York City's fine dining scene and has been running his own restaurants since 2004. He's a regular Food Network guest, and a HowStuffWorks podcast contributor. He's also on the City Harvest council, and can even facilitate a little wealth redistribution all by himself.

"If I go suck on myself off to go cook for 10 or 20 people, it can raise forty, fifty thousand dollars," he said. "People that know me, they want to pay for me to come and cook in their homes? They've got to donate a bunch of money to go to one of my charities that I work with."
